

Strategic Thinking, Planning and Execution

This is a blended programme consisting of a pre-workshop assignment and a three-day practical workshop that leads participants through the phases of identifying the strategic issues, understanding the present, considering the options, and developing and actioning the resulting strategic plans

Overview

Strategy is about shaping the future. Implicit in this definition is the concept of being proactive, not just responding reactively to events in the here and now but using imagination to make decisions about some future event or state. Also implicit in this definition is that strategic thinking, planning and execution brings about a 'changed' state.

Strategy should not be confused with long range planning. There is a fundamental difference between long range planning and strategic planning. They both look to the future but, while long range planning helps us prepare for responding reactively to a future state, strategic planning is about proactively making the future happen.

Strategic planning and execution is about having the long term strategic goals in our minds whenever we make decisions. In operational roles, it is easy to lose sight of the longer term to meet a short-term need. Taking a strategic perspective means balancing one with the other.

Format

This programme consists of three parts:

- A pre-workshop assignment preparing the ground by asking participants, through consultation, to identify strategic issues of their own
- A highly practical three-day workshop, working through the phases from issue identification to strategic planning and execution, using participants' own strategic issues
- A suggested post-workshop activity, developing the ideas emerging from the workshop.
